SUBJECT: Report on Human Rights in Guatemala

ISSUE FOR DECISION

Whether to approve the attached letter transmitting the Section 502B report on the human rights situation in Guatemala which has been requested by the House Foreign Affairs Committee.

ESSENTIAL FACTORS

On January 5 the Department received a letter dated December 23, 1983 from Congressmen Fassell, Barnes, and Yatron requesting that pursuant to the provisions of Section 502B(c) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 the Secretary provide a report on the human rights situation in Guatemala. The law stipulates that unless we transmit this report to the Hill within 30 days (i.e., on or before February 4) we can not provide any "security assistance" to Guatemala after that date until the report is submitted. Security assistance is defined to include EGP, MAP, IMET, FMS credit, FMS cash, and Munitions Control cases. The letter specifically requests that no security assistance be provided to Guatemala until the report is transmitted and consultations held with the Committee on Foreign Affairs, but this request is not legally binding.

The report tells Congress that while serious human rights problems persist in Guatemala, the government has taken actions to reduce them. Continued security assistance is essential to support that process.

RECOMMENDATION

That you approve the letter (copy attached) transmitting the 502B report to Chairman Fassell.

A. Human Rights Information

1. Political/Legal Situation

Guatemala has been ruled by a de facto military government for almost two years. The present Head of State, General Oscar Humberto Mejia Victores, Minister of Defense under President Efrain Rios Montt, assumed power on August 8, 1983 as the result of a nearly bloodless coup. Rios Montt, who himself took office as the result of a military coup in March 1982, was removed because of general discontent with his erratic style and evangelical ideas. Guatemala's senior military commanders believed Rios Montt's departure was necessary to prevent further factionalism within the military and to preempt a possible coup by the far right. Our inability to provide politically meaningful support to the Rios Montt Government contributed indirectly to its downfall.

The Mejia Government has taken a number of positive steps to restore a constitutional, electoral process and to address the practice of extra-legal detentions: it suspended the state of alarm; abolished the controversial special courts; granted an amnesty; confirmed Constituent Assembly elections for July 1, 1984; and announced that an elected president will assume office in 1985. The government further reaffirmed its commitment to democratization by continuing the process of legalizing political parties (37 political groups are now registered) and undertaking the registration of voters.

On January 19, 1984, the government promulgated an electoral law which provides the legal framework for the July Constituent Assembly elections (the law prohibits certain officials of the deposed Lucas regime from holding office, and bans active duty military, close relatives of the head of state, and certain other individuals from being candidates). On January 27, 1984, the Guatemalan Foreign Minister invited the countries with diplomatic missions in Guatemala to send observers to the forthcoming elections, and he indicated that the Guatemalan Government is considering also inviting regional organizations to send observers. The Constituent Assembly will convene on or before August 1 to begin the task of drafting a constitution and an electoral law which will serve as the basis for the presidential and congressional elections to follow. We have no indications that the Guatemalan military is considering running "official" candidates in the upcoming election or in favoring any specific group or party. On the contrary, the removal of General Lopez Fuentes (closely aligned with the far right National Liberation Movement) as Chief of Staff is an indication that the military wants to prevent any semblance of alignments with such groups.

Guatemala continues to face a strong Marxist-Leninist insurgency that has its roots in longstanding social, political, and economic inequities. The repression and corruption exhibited by the Lucas regime (1978-82) swelled the guerrilla ranks, and eventually lost the government the support of the young officers in the military. With the coming to power of Rios Montt in March 1982, the army implemented a plan that Lucas had rejected several years earlier -- the so-called "beans and rifles" policy. Central to that policy was the recognition that unless the government addressed the social and economic problems confronting the peasants in the highlands and provided an alternative to the repression, there was no hope in gaining the loyalty of Guatemala's Indian population. Therefore, while the army stepped up its activities against the guerrillas and developed the civil defense forces (taking the unusual action of supplying Indians with weapons to defend themselves), it also provided food, seed, and building materials to those displaced by the violence. Concurrently we saw a reduction in extra-legal violence, though some regional military commanders have exerted more effort in this regard than others.

Although the guerrilla movement is essentially Guatemalan, it has received external support in recent years. The army's shift in strategy caused the guerrillas to suffer military and political setbacks over the past two years. In turn, the guerrillas resorted to violence against elements of the Indian population. Despite government successes, the guerrillas continue to represent a serious threat. Since the August change in government, there has been an upsurge in guerrilla military and terrorist activity, both in the countryside and in the cities.

Following the March 1982 coup, the 1965 Constitution was abrogated and a Statute of government enacted on April 28, 1982. This statute closely resembles the 1965 Constitution. However, under the state of siege (July 1982 - March 1983) and the state of alarm (June - August 1983) political and civil liberties were restricted. General Mejia lifted the state of alarm and the current government, which includes civilian participation at the ministerial level, rules by decree under the framework provided by the April 1982 Statute. The real basis of support of the Mejia Government is the military commanders council.
2. Observance of Human Rights

Serious human rights problems continued in Guatemala in 1983. However, there has been a decline in the overall levels of politically related violence in 1983 compared to the situation in 1982, particularly in the countryside. Similarly, the situation with respect to civil and political rights has improved.

With the overthrow of the Lucas regime in March 1982, the Guatemalan Government undertook a campaign to aggressively pursue the guerrillas in their own sanctuaries in the highlands, and, at the same time, to better control the misuse of force by its own military. The government was much more successful at the former than the latter, though the trend since March 1982 has been positive (see Table I attached following Question 6, Section D). Though there are peaks (e.g., the summer of 1982 when the army returned to the highlands), generally there has been a progressive reduction in overall violence since 1982. This trend has been less noticeable in the reports of disappearances and kidnappings than it has in the reports of deaths.

Immediately after the August change in government there was an increase in the number of politically related civilian deaths and abductions. The average monthly number of abductions under Mejia (August-December 1983) was 32 compared to 21 under Rios Montt during his last seven months as president (January-July 1983). For this same time period, the average monthly number of non-combat (i.e., civilian) deaths is 41 under Mejia versus 42 under Rios Montt. Disappearances during the Mejia Government, however, after numbering 56 in September, have declined in each succeeding month, totaling 26 in December. Similarly, non-combat deaths were 54 in September and 69 in October, but declined to 33 in November and 20 in December.

We caution against excessive reliance on so-called body counts as a precise measurement of what is occurring in Guatemala, as it is impossible to record every incident that occurs. Figures collected over a period of time, using a similar collection methodology, can, however, indicate the general trends that are occurring.

There has been no resolution of the abductions and murders by Guatemalan security forces of several Guatemalans employed by a contractor for an AID financed bilingual education project. Resolution of these cases is complicated by the reluctance of the military to discipline those involved in such offenses. However, the government of Guatemala has given us written assurances that they are willing to work with us to implement safeguards against future abuses by guaranteeing the protection of AID employees working on the bilingual education program. The Mejia Government, according to intelligence reports, has also begun to control extra-legal violence by tightening control over the Presidential Intelligence Service (AGSAEMP) to prevent human rights abuses, and by disciplining AGSAEMP personnel who have ignored the new controls. This is significant because AGSAEMP had been implicated in abductions, tortures, and assassinations. The effectiveness of such actions is called into question by recent reports implicating government security forces in the kidnapping of a patient from a hospital emergency room and the abduction of several persons with ties to individuals believed to have been murdered by government security forces.

Both the governments of Rios Montt and Mejia have cooperated with international and non-governmental organizations who have visited Guatemala to investigate alleged violations of human rights. Lord Colville, the United Nations Human Rights Commission Special Rapporteur, visited Guatemala in June-July 1983 and issued his report in November. While acknowledging that basic rights had been violated, he noted the efforts of the Guatemalan Government to curb abuses and concluded that there has been "marked improvement" in 1983.

a. Integrity of the Person

Approximately 500 civilians were killed in Guatemala in 1983. It is impossible to assess responsibility for each of these deaths, although some were undoubtedly killed by government security forces or civil defense patrols. Other deaths were attributable to the guerrillas. In addition, there were some 1,100 military and guerrilla combat casualties.

During 1983 more than 300 persons disappeared. Again, some of these individuals were undoubtedly seized by government security forces, while others were kidnapped by guerrillas or by common criminals. Similarly, both the government and the insurgents have employed torture.

b. Civil and Political Rights

Many of the infringements on personal freedoms were removed when the state of alarm was lifted in August 1983. Public criticism of the government occurs. The government has ended the restrictions on political activity, established procedures to legalize political parties under which 37 political groups have begun the process to be recognized officially as political parties. Trade unions function. Freedom of religion is a reality, although some tensions exist between the Catholic Church and the government and between the Catholic Church and Protestant groups.

The United Nations High Commission for Refugees (UNHCR) estimates there are 35,000 displaced Guatemalans in UNHCR camps in Mexico. The Guatemalan Government has expressed its strong desire to cooperate in the voluntary repatriation of these refugees, and to assist in their resettlement in their villages of origin.

Although reports of massacres and other atrocities continued in 1983, there was a steep decline in credible reports of government violence in the countryside as compared to 1982. Some reports of massacres were fabricated or based on inaccurate information, such as the reports of massacres in Xoraxaj and Paxaraxut. In each of these two cases later investigation determined no massacres had occurred.

The Department's 1983 Human Rights Report for Guatemala provides a more comprehensive account of the human rights situation in that country, and a copy of that report is attached.

B. U.S. Government Action in Human Rights Area

1. Promotion of respect for and observance of Human Rights

During the past three years, U.S. officials have stressed with their Guatemalan counterparts the importance of human rights in American foreign policy and to our relationship. For the most part, our conversations have been held in private, though, at times, we have been public about our concerns. For example:

On January 7, 1983, when announcing the approval of the sale of spare parts, the Department of State stated, "...we want to see further progress in Guatemala in promoting respect for human rights..."

On March 4, 1983, following the execution of six persons, the Department of State stated, "We're naturally disturbed by reports that those executions took place after a secret trial. We've consistently stressed our support for due process and an open judicial system..."

On March 11, 1983, following reports of the disappearance and death of Patricio Ortiz Maldonado, an AID contractor, the Department of State stated, "We fully expect that the Guatemalan Government will see that justice is done in this case. We are also seeking assurances from the Guatemalans that anyone directly or indirectly in our employ can carry out his duties safely in Guatemala."
On June 20, 1983, following Rios Montt's announcement that elections would take place during the latter half of 1984, the Department of State noted that this was "...a positive step in returning Guatemala to democratic government."

On June 30, 1983, reacting to the imposition of the state of alarm, the Department of State expressed the hope that "the decree will be temporary and applied moderately in keeping with the government's announced intention to inaugurate today the Supreme Electoral Tribunal which will be initiating planning for the Constituent Assembly elections."

In a speech to the American Chamber of Commerce of Guatemala on August 9, 1983, Ambassador Chapin told his audience that there was a direct relationship between Administration support for assistance to Guatemala and progress on human rights issues.

More recently, on January 17, 1984, the Department of State noted that "we would oppose any change of government in Guatemala other than through democratic means."

On January 20, 1984, the Department of State "noted with pleasure" the Guatemalan Government's announcement the previous day of the electoral decree convening constituent assembly elections to be held on July 1 and stated that that government "has taken an important step toward the establishment of democratic constitutional rule."

Embassy officers, as a matter of course, have emphasized the importance of respect for human rights in their contacts with Guatemalan officials. In particular, senior Embassy officers, including the Ambassador and the Deputy Chief of Mission, emphasize human rights subjects in their public and private discussions. President Reagan's special envoy for Central America, Ambassador Richard Stone, also emphasizes respect for human rights in his discussions with top-level Guatemalan authorities. During visits to the countryside, Embassy officers have taken the opportunity to meet with senior Guatemalan military officers in the area and to stress to them the importance that the United States places on respect for human rights.

Human rights is the major issue discussed by high-level officials visiting Guatemala. During the past two years these have included, former Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs, Ambassador Bosworth (June 1982); former Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Human Rights, Melvin Levitsky (August 1982); Ambassador Walters (April 1983); Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Human Rights, Gary Matthews (June 1983); Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs, Langhorne Motley (September 1983); Under Secretary of Defense, Fred Ikle, and Assistant Secretary of State for Human Rights, Elliott Abrams, (November 1983). Bilateral discussions in which human rights have been a central topic have taken place in third countries, as did one recently (December 1983) between General Mejia and Vice President Bush during the Argentine presidential inauguration.

Recognizing that democracy is not just elections, we have supported the return of the AIFLD (American Institute for Free Labor Development) program to Guatemala to build a truly independent labor movement. Our development assistance has the purpose of strengthening Guatemala's rural population. Congressional restrictions in the FY-84 Continuing Resolution prohibit our funds from going through government agencies and thus limit our ability to help build the rural health, education and agriculture infrastructure so necessary for Guatemala's future. For example, because of these restrictions we are unable to provide funds to the Peace Corps for use in local development projects or to include Guatemala in our efforts to help improve Central American judicial systems.

During the Lucas Government (1978-1982) we were unable to have any kind of productive dialogue on human rights issues. That has not been the case with his successors, though obviously progress on some items has been greater than on others (e.g., progress toward democratic elections vs. punishment of military officers for infractions of the code of conduct). Publicly and privately we have sought to reinforce the positive steps taken by the Guatemalan Government since March 1982 -- electoral calendar, amnesty, end of the states of alarm and siege. Privately, we have told the Guatemalans that, despite this progress, actions must be taken to eliminate any involvement by members of government security forces in kidnappings and killings. If such actions are not forthcoming, we have said that the bilateral relationship will remain strained and there will be no significant amounts of economic let alone any security assistance.

2. Disassociation of U.S. Security Assistance from Violations of Human Rights

Since FY 1978 there has been no military assistance program (MAP, FMS credit or IMET) for Guatemala. The only significant action concerning defense-related items since FY 1980 has been limited to a single authorization of six million dollars in helicopter and other spare parts and safety of flight equipment. Key government officials clearly understand that any resumption of a normal security relationship depends upon a substantially improved human rights performance on their part. Our recent action to proceed with that sale was due to our belief that since the human rights situation had not deteriorated since our original decision, it was important to fulfill the commitment we made to Guatemala in January 1983, in large part to encourage them to continue to make progress in the areas of human rights and democracy including especially the control of the security forces. This action in moving forward on spare parts -- at a time when only three of Guatemala's eleven helicopters that carry eight or more people are operational -- does not mean we will automatically approve other FMS cash sales or Munitions Control licenses. These cases will be addressed individually, and will hinge on continued Guatemalan progress in the areas of concern. In private conversations informing the Guatemalan government of our action, we have made this point very clear.

C. U.S. Interests Justifying a Security Assistance Program

Our principal interest in Guatemala is in promoting the development of a stable democratic society that will protect human rights. That will not come overnight. But for the first time in many years, there appears to be a government in place that is committed to hold honest elections, to lessen the role of the military in the government, and to reduce the levels of political violence that have plagued that country for years.

Our ability to influence that process is minimal at present. We have not had a close relationship with Guatemala for several years. All Guatemalans, regardless of their political viewpoints, are wary of U.S. interference in what they regard as their internal affairs. Nevertheless, the limited security program that now exists (FMS cash sales) can act as a positive sign in reinforcing the military's commitment to the democratic process. How much influence we will have is open to conjecture. But without such a tool, we will have little or none. Failure to provide some politically meaningful sign of support for the efforts being undertaken to return the country to democratic rule, and to reduce human rights violations, will only increase the chance of further political instability.

In addition, the U.S. has other strong interests in Guatemala and the region which necessitate a solid, bilateral relationship, including a positive relationship with the Guatemalan military. Guatemala has been an active participant in the Contadora process and a supporter of a comprehensive approach to peace in the region. We need tools to encourage the GOG -- and its military -- to continue to support the unity of the Central American nations in this process. Also, we have an interest in encouraging the Guatemalans to continue to seek dialogue with Belize and the United Kingdom in order to reach a peaceful, negotiated solution to the century-old Belize-Guatemala territorial dispute. Moreover, our overall regional economic and security interests cannot be effectively addressed if Guatemala -- Central America's most populous and industrialized country -- is kept at the margins.

The Department believes that the continuation of our economic and security programs, in a measured fashion in order to promote further human rights progress, is in the national interest. The resumption of developmental assistance programs with governmental entities and the approval of a security assistance program for Guatemala, including FMS credit, IMET, and ESF, could act as a catalyst for further improvements in the human rights situation in Guatemala. A limited security assistance program could open lines of communication with key officers who have felt isolated from the United States for years. Through IMET, younger officers, who have had little or no experience with democracy, would receive valuable exposure to the operation of the military under such a system. Properly channeled, FMS credits would allow us to work more effectively with those elements in the Guatemalan Government who share our goals of restoring democracy and addressing the nation's social and economic needs. It would reinforce developing a positive relationship between the military and the indigenous population in Guatemala through emphasis on civic action and tighter command and control (now hindered by inadequate transport and communications facilities). ESF can play a vital role in bringing about economic stability, particularly necessary as the country enters the electoral campaign.

On the basis of the above considerations, we have determined that it is in the national interest of the United States to provide limited amounts of security assistance (as defined in Section 502 B (d) (2) of the Foreign Assistance Act) to Guatemala.
D. Other Information Requested by the Committee on Foreign Affairs

(1)(a) All information available to the U.S. Government with respect to the recent disappearance and murder of AID employees in Guatemala. (b) The Department of State's judgment as to whether or not any Guatemalan civilian or military officials were involved in planning, implementing or covering up these disappearances or murders.

Maria Julieta Esperanza Sanchez Castillo and her daughter, Piedad Esperanza Barrios Sanchez, were abducted by armed men on October 7, 1983. At the time, Mrs. Sanchez was employed by the Guatemalan Ministry of Education in the Rural Education Department. She was peripherally involved with AID because she was studying for a Masters Degree at a local university under the sponsorship of the Ministry in a program financed by AID for education administration.

Jose Felipe Ralac and his wife, Celia, were abducted on October 18, 1983. He was then employed by an American company holding an AID contract for work with the Guatemalan Ministry of Education on a pilot bilingual education project.

Firemen in Coatepeque, Quetzaltenango, received an anonymous telephone call on November 12, 1983, informing them that a car that had been involved in an accident could be discovered near Pajapita, San Marcos, a nearby town. When the firemen arrived at Pajapita, they found a wrecked vehicle and the bodies of Jose Felipe Ralac, Maria Julieta Sanchez and Piedad Barrios Sanchez. According to the coroner's report, both Mr. Ralac and Mrs. Sanchez died of second degree burns, and Ms. Barrios died of a severe blow to the head. Firemen also discovered identification documents for the three victims, as well as several forged I.D. papers. At this time, Celia Ralac has not appeared.

The evidence strongly suggests the three were killed prior to the accident. People who knew the victims claimed that none of the three knew how to drive a car. An eyewitness also claimed that he saw a man get out of the vehicle, pour gas on it, and then leave with another man on a motorcycle.

Guatemalan Government officials maintain in public and private that the three people died in the automobile accident though we are unaware of any official Guatemalan Government investigation which has probed the strange circumstances surrounding the accident. The lack of a thorough investigation and the repeated assertion by the officials that the victims had been involved in "subversive" activities suggests involvement on the part of some Guatemalan Government officials though we have no evidence that directly implicates anyone.
(2)(a) All information available to the U.S. Government concerning the case of Patricio Ortiz Maldonado, an AID employee who was murdered in February, 1983. (b) The Department of State's judgment as to who was responsible for that murder and as to whether or not those responsible will be brought to justice.

Patricio Ortiz Maldonado was a Guatemalan employee of an American company holding an AID contract for work with the Guatemalan Ministry of Education on a pilot bilingual education project. He traveled to the small rural town of Ixtahuacan, Huehuetenango, on February 8, 1983, on official project-related business. That afternoon, he presented himself at the military post in Ixtahuacan to identify himself and his reason for being in the area. The following morning, he, along with two Ministry of Education counterpart employees and the mother of one of them, left Ixtahuacan to go to Cotecapan, Huehuetenango. They were reportedly stopped at 6:00 a.m. about two kilometers outside of Ixtahuacan at a military check point by an army patrol.

It has never been clearly established what happened after their car was stopped by the army patrol and they were seized. According to an army press release, they were shot and killed by the patrol as they attempted to escape. They reportedly fell into the Guilco River; the army patrol never recovered their bodies.

Second Lieutenant Ottoniel Fajardo Miranda was arrested in March 1983, and charged with kidnapping in this case. He was the officer in charge of the unit which seized the four. On June 29, 1983, a military court acquitted Lt. Fajardo because of insufficient evidence. The Eighth Chamber of the Court of Appeals of Quetzaltenango, a civilian court, upheld the military court's verdict on July 15, 1983.

There is no question about the Guatemalan military's responsibility for the deaths of Patricio Ortiz and his companions -- the Guatemalan Government admits it. What is uncertain is the exact circumstances of the deaths of these people, and the involvement of the Guatemalan military leadership in either the crime itself or in the cover-up. The official version of the circumstances of the death is factually inconsistent and represents the third revised official version, none of which was internally consistent.

Information provided by those close to the deceased indicate that an army patrol, headed by Lt. Fajardo, detained Patricio Ortiz and his companions, and eventually took them to the military zone headquarters in Huehuetenango. What exactly happened at the base is conjecture, though at some point the detainees were killed. Upon whose orders is unknown. It appears from the multiple and conflicting explanations surrounding the disappearances that senior Guatemalan officers have been involved in the cover-up of the crime.

It is unlikely that anyone will be brought to justice, because the Guatemalan Government considers the case closed. The Guatemalan Government, however, has taken steps to prevent a recurrence of this kind of incident. In a January 5, 1984 diplomatic note, the Guatemalan Government pledged "with all the means in its reach to guarantee the security of the experts, technicians and in general of all the personnel who lend their services to the (bilingual-education) project."

Our Embassy has provided the government of Guatemala with the names of individuals involved in the project so that they may be issued I.D. cards which will be recognized by the military authorities. We understand the government plans to initiate a similar program for its own employees involved with the project in the Ministry of Education. We have not made this known publicly because of fears on the part of the Guatemalan Government that if the document becomes known to the guerrillas, they might assassinate an AID-related employee in order to embarrass the government of Guatemala and further damage relations between that government and the United States.

Recent events raise doubts about the government's ability to implement such a program. On January 21, a regional education supervisor under the bilingual education project was stopped at a military roadblock and taken to the military base at Huehuetenango. He was released the following day at noon. On the night of January 20, armed men reportedly left that same base and attempted to detain a first cousin to Patricio Ortiz Maldonado, the contract employee killed by security forces in February 1983. This person escaped and is now in hiding.

Whether these people were detained because of their association with the bilingual education program or because of some other reason, is unknown.
(3)(a) All information available to the U.S. Government concerning the murders of Father Stanley Rother, Reverend James Troyer, Brother James Miller, and Mennonite missionary H. Yutah Clouds. (3)(b) The Department of State's judgment as to whether the Government of Guatemala has made a serious attempt to investigate and bring to justice those responsible for these murders, and whether civilian or military officers were involved in any aspect of the murders or in covering up these murders.

Father Stanley Rother: Father Stanley Rother, a Catholic priest, was killed on July 28, 1981, at his parish in Santiago de Atitlan by three unidentified assailants. At the time of his murder, there was considerable guerrilla activity in the area south of Lake Atitlan. In May 1980, ORPA guerrillas had briefly occupied Santiago. Subsequently, Guatemalan Government forces stepped up their operations in the area.

From November 1980, Father Rother had been in contact with the United States Embassy in Guatemala. At first he viewed the situation in Santiago as quiet. On January 14, 1981, however, he advised the Embassy that 17 unarmed peasants had been killed by soldiers in the area, that his catechist had been abducted, and that he had received two death threats. Despite the death threats, Father Rother said he was more concerned for the safety of his Indian assistant than for himself. On January 20, 1981, Father Rother advised the Embassy of his plans to depart Guatemala with his assistant, and did so on January 28. He returned to Guatemala later in the spring.

On the night of July 28, 1981, three assailants went to Father Rother's residence and forced the gardener to lead them to the priest's rooms where they shot Father Rother. The National Police report of their investigation included reference to the victim's ransacked room and open safe. Statements were taken from the gardener and a Mexican nun who also saw the assailants. The witnesses described the three men as Ladinos (that is, of mixed Indian and European ancestry, as opposed to Indians).

On August 1, 1981, three Indians, who were acquaintances of Father Rother, were arrested and charged with robbery and murder. The police stated that the arrests were based upon statements provided by the Mexican nun. Guatemalan newspapers reported that the three men had confessed to the crime. Doubt persisted, however, regarding the guilt of the three men. The Mexican nun returned to Mexico where her order released a statement saying that the Guatemalan police had used her name to make false statements. The physical descriptions of the assailants did not match those of the arrested men. Robbery in the poor parish was considered an unlikely motive. The U.S.
Embassy, which had obtained the slug and casing from the scene of the murder, delivered this evidence to the Guatemalan Government with an offer by the FBI to assist in examining them. The Guatemalan Government never requested U.S. assistance and no reports of the government's own findings have ever been made available to the U.S. or presented to the Court.

In September 1981, the U.S. Ambassador discussed this case with the Guatemalan Interior Minister, who stated his opinion that the arrested men were not guilty. The Ambassador expressed U.S. concern that there not be a miscarriage of justice. In January 1982, the three men were found guilty of murder and condemned to 8 years imprisonment and payment of a fine. After the change of government in March 1982, and at the request of the U.S. Ambassador, the Chief Justice of the Guatemalan Supreme Court agreed to review the lower court decision. On May 17, 1982, an appellate court reversed the conviction and the men were released.

Since that time, the Embassy has made numerous requests to the Guatemalan Government for the results of its investigation into the murder of Father Rother. On July 19, 1983, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs advised the Embassy that the case is of great concern to the government of Guatemala and an effort was being made to investigate it. The Ministry's note referred to the difficulty in investigating the case after the passage of so much time and the fact that people who might have been able to give testimony have not come forth for fear of reprisal. The latest communication the Embassy received on the case was dated November 8, 1983, and provides no further information.

Elements of the Guatemalan security forces could have been involved in the murder of Father Rother. Certainly, government officials, either through ineptness or intention, failed to provide evidence to the Court or others investigating the case. The arrest of the three Indians stopped any active investigation for more than six months. It is unlikely that any further information will be developed at this point, more than 30 months after the murder.

Reverend John David Troyer: Mennonite Pastor John David Troyer was shot to death on September 14, 1981, in the village of Palama, Department of Chimaltenango. According to eyewitness accounts provided by his wife, Mary Troyer, and a Mennonite missionary, Gary Miller, 10 armed men attacked the Troyer house at about 2300 hours on September 13. After ransacking the house for two hours, and burning the Mennonite mission vehicle, one of the 10 men shot both John Troyer and Mr. Miller with an automatic weapon, killing the former.

The Embassy requested the government of Guatemala to investigate Pastor Troyer's death. On June 25, 1982, the government advised the Embassy that on January 18 Guatemalan security forces engaged and destroyed a guerrilla unit operating in the area of Tecpan and San José Poaquil, Chimaltenango. Based upon the area in which the guerrilla group had been operating, the weapons it had been using, and the eyewitness accounts provided by Mary Troyer and Gary Miller, the government of Guatemala is of the opinion that it was this guerrilla group which killed John David Troyer.

The government explanation is plausible, as guerrilla groups were active in the area.

Brother James Miller: James Miller, a Christian Brother, was murdered on February 13, 1982, by three unidentified assailants in front of his residence in Huehuetenango. The Huehuetenango police report indicated that the murder was witnessed by a number of people and that it was presumed the assailants were "subversives." On May 31, 1982, the Embassy received a diplomatic note in answer to earlier notes from the Embassy. The Guatemalan Government note stated that Brother Miller was well known to the authorities in Huehuetenango for his close collaboration with personnel of the military zone, that in that area subversive elements were physically eliminating civil and military authorities and their collaborators, and that Brother Miller unfortunately was one of their victims. The Embassy reiterated its interest in this case most recently to the Ministry of Interior on October 13, 1983, but a response of November 14 provided no further information.

It is difficult to determine who is responsible for Brother Miller's death. On the one hand the Christian Brothers had received threats, presumably from the right, for operating an Indian school. On the other hand, Brother Miller, who had departed from Nicaragua after the Sandinistas came to power, was rumored to have maintained ties with wealthy Nicaraguans—giving reason for the left to kill him. There is no indication in any of the information available to the Embassy that any military or civilian authorities of the government of Guatemala have been involved in the murder or in any cover-up. Without a new development it is unlikely that there will be any further progress in the investigation of this case. The Embassy maintained close contact with church sources, who initially indicated they had leads in the case and, in one instance, thought they might know who was responsible; nonetheless, these sources never provided that information to the Embassy, although the Embassy said it would bring that information to the attention of the government.

Kai Yutah Clouds: The body of Veit Nikolas Stoscheck, also known as Kai Yutah Clouds, was found on October 11, 1980, in Antigua, Guatemala. The autopsy report states that death was due to traumatic shock and fracture of the skull.

Mr. Stoscheck had been working in the village of San Jose Poaquil, Chimaltenango, since shortly after the 1976 earthquake. Mr. Stoscheck was not a Mennonite missionary.

He was last seen in the town of Chimaltenango on October 10, where he was giving a class on agronomy under the auspices of a private voluntary organization, World Neighbors. Although there were third-hand reports that Mr. Stoscheck was forced into a vehicle one block away from the main square of Chimaltenango by several armed men, no witnesses ever came forward.

The Embassy has brought this case to the attention of the Guatemalan Government on many occasions since October 1980, most recently on October 13, 1983. The latest response of the government, dated November 14, 1983, contains no information which would lead to those responsible for Mr. Stoscheck's death.

It is unlikely the Guatemalan authorities will be able to develop any information regarding this case. Despite unverified reports that government security forces were involved in Mr. Stoscheck's murder, there is no evidence which supports the supposition that the government of Guatemala was involved. Similarly, we have no information which would indicate an effort by any military or civilian authorities to cover-up the facts or circumstances of Mr. Stoscheck's death.
(4) All information available to the U.S. Government which would indicate that the officials of the Government of Guatemala have been or are now engaged in, have ordered, or have otherwise been involved in murdering or kidnapping any individual or group of individuals in Guatemala.

As noted in the Department's 1983 Human Rights Report on Guatemala, elements of the Guatemalan security forces have been responsible for a number of deaths and disappearances. In the case of Patricio Ortiz Maldonado, an A.I.D. contract employee who was killed in February 1983, the Guatemalan Government has admitted its responsibility. Security forces for a long time have detained persons without due process for questioning about their alleged involvement in guerrilla activities, although they have officially denied doing so. A number of cases processed by the Special Courts are examples. Except in cases where guerrilla forces admit responsibility for a disappearance or execution, one can only speculate about who was responsible for any particular act of violence or what was their motive.

Although the Guatemalan Government has frequently denied that any of their security forces have been involved in such acts, both the Rios Montt Government and that of General Mejia have taken action against some security force personnel allegedly involved in criminal activity. Under Rios Montt, approximately 270 policemen were removed from office, tried and convicted in criminal courts for crimes ranging from murder to extortion. Among these was Roberto Cruz Guadiel, head of Guatemala's INTERPOL section, who was arrested for murder. Before a verdict could be reached, he was found hanged in his prison cell.

Under General Mejia, some 125 policemen have been removed from office and turned over to the courts for legal action. On January 5, 1984, Guatemalan newspapers reported that the government had arrested two members of the National Police for kidnapping and murder, and that three military policemen were arrested for committing a series of robberies and assaults in the Department of Escuintla. The articles stated that the three were involved with a band of civilian criminals. The civilians reportedly were arraigned before a regular criminal court, while military authorities brought the three men to the capital to face a military court.

Intelligence information indicates that General Mejia has taken action to reign in the Presidential Intelligence Service which long has been accused of involvement in kidnappings and murders. Officers reportedly have taken stiffer action against personnel who exceed their authority and use excessive violence. Some low-level employees have been arrested for their involvement in criminal acts. Events like the abduction of a patient from his hospital bed on January 31 by individuals believed to be associated with the security forces raise serious concerns about the ability or willingness of elements of the security forces to carry out directives issued by Mejia. It remains to be seen how effective these actions will be in changing the overall modus operandi of the security forces.
(5) A list of all cases of murder, kidnapping or disappearance, with the circumstances and political implications, since August 8, 1983, which have come to the attention of U.S. officials through the Guatemalan press or through other means.

This is a partial list based largely on public reports. While an effort has been made to exclude obviously criminal activity, most of these incidents cannot be attributed with certainty to political as opposed to criminal or personal motives. Even when political motives are suspected it is difficult in most cases to determine with certainty if the actions were perpetrated by groups of the right, left or elements associated with or within the government.

* Beginning of Rios Montt term
 Mejia takes control

Compiled from official GOG bulletins, independent news reports, guerrilla reports, and other sources available to the U.S. Embassy in Guatemala.
The Special Courts were created by ex-President José Efraín Ríos Montt on July 1, 1982, by Decree Law 46-82, using the powers contained in Article 85 of the "Fundamental Statute of Government." (This Statute replaced the 1965 Constitution which was annulled by the military coup of March 23, 1982.)

The announcement of the abolition of the secret Special Courts was made by the current Guatemalan Head of State, General Mejía, on August 13, 1983. The Special Tribunals were abolished effective September 1, 1983, by Decree Law 93-83.

Article Six of Decree Law 93-83 provides that persons who have been convicted and sentenced to prison by the Special Courts may appeal to the Supreme Court of Guatemala for a review of their sentence and have it adjusted downward to the "most benign" sentence provided for the crime of which they were convicted in the country's penal code.

The prisoner must first petition the Supreme Court for a reduction in sentence. The Supreme Court will accept a request for application of the "most benign" provision in any type of written format including a letter, a telegram, or a professionally prepared legal petition. Upon receipt of the request, the Supreme Court assigns the case to a lower court for review to determine if the sentence should be reduced. The Supreme Court itself does not "track" the cases once they have been assigned to a lower court. The results of the lower court's review regarding any reduction in sentence are communicated directly to the Office of Prisons which maintains all prisoners' records.

In addition to a possible reduction in sentence, under the provisions of Decree Law 93-83, all prisoners in Guatemala, including those convicted by the Special Courts, are eligible for a further reduction in their sentences for "good behavior" while incarcerated.

Officials in the Judicial Branch indicate that prisoners convicted by the Special Courts are assigned to regular prisons and are not per se kept in any special form of confinement.

The following is a list (as of January 17, 1984) of prisoners who have been tried, convicted, and sentenced by the Special Courts. Some have been released from prison. No firm numbers are available regarding the total number of persons... processed by the Special Courts (i.e., arrested but not brought to trial or tried but found innocent). The numbers following an individual's name refer to the crime of which the person was convicted in those cases in which this information was available. Because the information was obtained from various sources, there are occasional inconsistencies in the spellings of names. In addition, in September 1982 and in March 1983 a total of 15 persons were executed by the Rios Montt regime after being convicted by the Special Courts.

(8) All information available to the U.S. Government on religious persecution in Guatemala and, in particular, information related to threats against or killing of religious workers and officials.

Thirteen Catholic clergy were murdered at the height of the violence which took place during the government of General Lucas Garcia. No clergy, however, were murdered during the year and one half in which the fundamentalist Protestant General Rios Montt ruled. Accusations of religious persecution during the Rios Montt Government were limited for the most part to the perception that Protestants were receiving preferential treatment from civil and military officials, or that Catholic Church property in the conflictive zones had been occupied by government troops. One of the major justifications of the August 1983 coup which overthrew Rios Montt was that in his fervent Protestant belief, Rios Montt had discriminated against Catholics. Therefore, it was generally believed that the new government would move quickly to restore close relations with the Catholic Church. General Mejia, in fact, did promptly state that the government would see that adherents of all faiths were treated equally by the state, and that the traditionally Catholic Guatemala would return to warm relations with the Church.

The warm feeling between the Catholic Church and state occasioned by the numerous professions of faith and other pro-Church statements emanating from the new Mejia Government did not continue uninterrupted. The most serious rift occurred when Father Ramirez Monasterio of Antigua was murdered on November 7 -- the first priest killed since the Lucas Government. The situation was further complicated by the fact that this murder took place only a few days after General Mejia himself had excoriated the Church for tolerating elements known to support guerrillas.

The Church hierarchy condemned the government as responsible for the crime, although local clergy in Antigua believe the government was not behind the murder and the government has steadfastly and emphatically denied involvement. According to some intelligence reports, extreme right wing groups may have been responsible for the murder. In addition, there is also speculation that Father Ramirez was assassinated by the guerrillas.

Chief of State Mejia, accompanied by his Foreign Minister and Chief of Staff, called upon the Papal Nuncio to offer condolences. Nonetheless, the situation continued to deteriorate as Archbishop Penado -- then in Rome prior to his investiture -- decried Guatemala's endemic violence in the Vatican newspaper. Government spokesmen lambasted the Bishop as unpatriotic. The Church, in turn, blasted the spokesmen as "liars." At this point the government apparently decided to begin anew and the spokesmen publicly apologized.
The Department is not aware of any reports that members of the clergy have been threatened since the death of Father Ramirez. The Chief of State's numerous public appearances at Church functions during his tenure have signaled his support for the Church. This has seemingly filtered down to the most minor officials. Catholic Church contacts report that local officials grant Church officials more respect in their dealings with them than was so during the Ríos Montt Government.

Most of the difficulty in maintaining good Church/state relations in Guatemala stems from the continuing insurgency. The most recent incident to arise concerned the December 22 arrest and questioning of an American priest, Father Haren, in the northern Department of the Peten. Father Haren serves parishioners who live in the area of a recent guerrilla attack on an army patrol which resulted in the deaths of forty soldiers. A soldier who searched Father Haren's pick-up truck said he found the fuse of a grenade in the back. The priest was detained, questioned and released into the custody of the Church. The public coverage of the incident -- connecting the priest with the guerrillas -- did nothing for the rapprochement desired by the government.

Similarly, a December 12 incident in Huehuetenango in which a Catholic seminarian was shot and killed by a Civil Defense patrol when he failed to heed a warning to stop, has hurt Church/state relations. Although the Church deplored the killing as an "assassination," the army spokesman said it was an accident. Like the Peten, Huehuetenango is a scene of such guerrilla activity.

It was prior to both of these incidents that the acting Apostolic Administrator of the Archdiocese had implied government complicity in the disappearance of some five hundred catechists. The current government was alleged to be responsible. It appears that this number was a compilation of disappearances since unrest heightened in 1979; the Church has not amplified on this statement.

Catholic Church relations with the government are clearly improving in the Department of El Quiche which was the scene of some of the country's worst violence in 1981. After several priests were killed in El Quiche, the Bishop retired his personnel from the diocese, and fled to Costa Rica in 1982. He returned and now resides in Guatemala City. Following the departure of Church personnel from El Quiche, the army occupied numerous vacant Church properties, using them to store food for its civic action programs, house troops, serve as headquarters,
Since the appointment of a new apostolic administrator for the diocese in 1983, however, the Church has sent several priests back to the department. As Church personnel have returned, the army has returned several properties, and has promised to return others. In the meantime, the army asserts that if it had not occupied the vacant properties, they would have been destroyed by vandals.

After a rough start, the relations between Guatemalan Protestant churches and the Mejia Government are improving. Alleged to have benefited unjustly from preferential treatment during the Rios Montt government, the Protestant churches were widely criticized during the initial days of the Mejia Government. Some Protestants also state that numerous members were threatened by unknown elements during that period. As a result of this change in the political climate, the Protestant churches formed a new political umbrella organization known as the Evangelical Churches-Coordinating Committee to defend their interests. This new committee met with Gen. Mejia and was reportedly pleased with the reception it received.

The Protestant churches have reopened numerous chapels which they, like the Catholics, had closed for two years in the areas of conflict. They are actively preaching the gospel throughout the country with little — if any — official harassment.

This does not mean that preaching the gospel in Guatemala is without danger for Protestants as well as Catholics; on December 18 two evangelical pastors were kidnapped in the Peten after preaching to a youth convention held in an area of intense guerrilla activity. In late January the bodies of the two pastors were located by government authorities in another village in the Peten close to the site of their abduction. Although church officials believe that the government was responsible for the kidnappings, no conclusive evidence has come to light to substantiate this belief.
