know the students in Mexico City were showing signs of discontent. However, they believed they would not risk another violent confrontation with the authorities, continued saying that just after last fall's demonstrations and their bloody aftermath, the people of Mexico were initially pro-student and angry at the strong measures taken by the authorities. Later public opinion changed and people came to believe that students were to blame for the riots and the results. Because of this change in public opinion, student leaders believe that future disorders will be blamed on them and that the people will not support them.
